DENNY'S LUCK.

BY WILLIAM G. PATTEN.

Dennis Lowry was his name, but every one who knew him called him Denny He was a tall, rather good looking, yet slouchy-appearing young fellow of twen tv-two or three. He had always lived in the sleepy little country village of New ton and every one for miles around knew him. He was called lazy and shiftless and it was true that he had never excited himself a great deal to prove the charge false. He was inclined to lay his poor circumstances to luck. Worse than being born poor, he had been unlucky. This was what he told himself, but people who knew him, averred that he had never made any vigorous attempt to change his luck. Denny was a freamer. It was his delight to wander away through the woods or fields, and lay all alone and the sweet-scented grass and watch the clouds as they sailed along above, or to follow the swift flight of the swallows as they called any whirled at divry as they circled and whirled at dizzy heights. He would lie thus for hours with his mind filled with wild fancies of breathed.

He drew a long breath as though a sweet speil had been broken, and his eyes sought hers.

"Beautiful!" he whispered, in a soul-thrilling way. "Yet the word does not express it. Painter or poet cannot reproduce the beauty, the peace, the love of God there is in such a scene."

For a long time after this they did not speak, but feasted their eyes on the scene before them. Finally Denny took Inza's hand, and gazing into her dark eyes, said earnestly:

hand, and gasting the learnestly:

"Insa, I love you. You know this already. We have grown up together, and our affection for each other has been no secret, yet now I wish to tell you that it is not merely as a friend that I love you, but I want you for my wife. Will you but I want you for my wife. Will you marry me?"

Insa was startled,
"Denny," cried she, "you surprise me! I have not dreamed of hearing such words from you, and yet I—I have," she confessed, falteringly—"I have not allowed myself to think of such things, for it seemed that when you spoke such words yeu would tear us asunder forever."

words you would tear us asunder forever."

"Why," he asked hoarsely. "Why tear us asunder? I I you become my wife that will simply bind us closer together."

"Denny" she spoke softly, "can you support a wife? We have been together from childhood and I acknowledge that I love you, yet would I not be a burden on your hands? You have nothing with which to begin life, and you say luck has always been sgainst you. Would not your situation be still worse were you married?"

For a few moments his head fell upon his breast. They sat there in silence. From the pasture far away came the mellow sound of a cow bell and the crow mellow sound of a cow bell and the crow that was still circling over the woods uttered a few harsh cries.

Suddenly Denny started to his feet and stretched his hand toward the sunpainted west.

"There is gold there!" he cried.

was working for fortune—and her. But slowly a year dragged by and still Denny was as far from fortune as ever. His luck hung by him like a spectre. Finally he ceased to write. Insa was tortured by hope and fear. Had he made a fortunate strike and was coming home, or was he sick, perhaps dead? She could not tell.

Another year wore away and then Another year wore away and then Inza was married. It was a match of her parents' making, and she consented to please them.

One evening just at sunset, eight years after Inza's marriage to Joel Gray, a bewinkered, foctsore, weary-appearing tramp turned into Mr. Gray's dooryard. His clothes were raged and his entire appearance was that of a man who had seen hard times, indeed. He came along the path with a slow, tired stop. Near the door a little dark-eyed girl was playing, and the tramp paused to gaze steadily at her for several minutes, Inza, who was standing by a window with a baby in her arms, regarding the stranger with some alarm, saw him dash a tear from his eye. Then she knew that there was nothing to fear from him. Just then Joel came from the barn yard with a brimming milk pall in either land. The stranger turned toward him as he approached and aked if he could have samething to est and a night's oldging.

"It is asking much, I know," said the Joel Gray had no particular love for tramps, yet there was something about this man that won his sympathy. As a this man that won his sympathy. As a result, the stranger was given some supper and permission to stop at the farm house that night.

The tramp ate his bread and milk in silence, but Insa was conscious that a pair of sad blue eyes were watching her every movement.

The man did not eat much for one who professed to be so hungry, and when loss spoke to him he replied in a low, mumbling manner. When he had finished eating and moyed away from the table, little Lucy, Inna's oldest child, came to him and deliberately climbed upon his knee. He gathered her up in his arms, while his whole frame trembled with emotion. The shadows concealed the tears that ran down the man's face and were lost in his beard.

That night Joel Gray's buildings were burned to the ground. To this day it is a mystery how the fire caught, but sometime in the night the family was aroused by the smoke and flames. The fire had already seized the house in its fatal grasp, and with difficulty Mr. Gray and Inza escaped, the latter with the babe in her arms. Close behind them the tramp came staggering out of the burning house. Joel caught him fiercely by the throat.

"This is your work!" shouted the farmer, hoarsely.

The stranger dashed aside his assailant's hands as he replied:

"As God is my judge it is not!"

Every moment that followed seemed like an age of suspense and horror to Joel Gray and his wile. Suddenly a dark figure appeared at one of the windows, and all about him the fierce flames seemed leaping and curling. He held a large bundle in his arms. There was a crash of glass, a dark mass shooting downward, a heavy thud, and the tramp lay at their feet.

Denny and Ioza Porter grew up together. They were playmates while children, and their friendship seemed togrow stronger as they became older. Denny was so kind and gentic that he seemed much like a girl himself. Ioza was a little, dark-cyod, red-lipped witch, whose very soul seemed always abubble with mirth. She was unlike Denny in many respects, yet something seemed to bind them together.

One night they wandered away across the fields to an old moss-covered well, where they stopped to watch the sunset. Inza sat down upon a flat stone and Denny flung himself at her feet. The sun had just sunk bebind the western hills, but the purple and gray clouds were painted with the yarious colors of damask, crimson and molton gold.

For several moments they sat there enraptured at the beautiful scene. Finally linza spoke:

"Isn't it beautiful, Denny?" she breathed.

He drew a long breath as though a sweet spell had been broken, and his eyes sought hers.

"Beautiful!" he whispered, in a soulthrilling way. "Yet the word does not express it. Painter or poet cannot reprost.

Words were not needed for his answer; one look into her dark eyes was enough. He clasped her in his arms, and for the first time their lips met in a kiss of true love.

A week later Denny started on his journey.

Soon she received letters from Denny—hopeful, encoursging letters. She answered them all, trying to cheer him who was working for fortune—and her. But slowly a year dragged by and still Denny.

FOR washing the hair, only the very best of soap and pure water should be used. The average soap contains too much free alkali, which draws the natural oil from the hair and scalp, and leaves the former harsh and lusterless, while it roughens the latter, causing scurf or dandruff. The purity and mildness of the IVORY SOAF gives it pre-eminence for cleaning the hair and scalp. It contains no free alkali, so its use insures a clean and healthy head of hair of the luster and softness of silk,

There are many white soaps, each represented to be "just as good as the 'lvory';" they ARE NOT, but like all counterfeits, lack the peculiar and remarkable qualities of the genuine. Ask for "lvory" Soap and insist upon getting it.
